

We wake to noise, the dim bumping of a plough clearing new snow. Outside the window white flakes stream downwind, a few turn in the air currents close to the house. A soft whistle in the attic above.
Late December between Christmas and the New Year, an interlude. We lie late in bed, doze, mumbling, then sit by a wood fire reading poetry, housebound by the wind and drifting. Pillows of snow load the spruce, snow traces the lines of ruinous bare wild apple trees.
I imagine writing another kind of poem, a long letter to my friends at the gate of the year, a daybook that captures what's here and immediate-- the black dog plunging her face in white drifts joyfully, again and again, or this morning's breakfast, coffee and apple turnover eaten while I scribble lines begun as I stood naked at a table in a cold upstairs room, long wise lines to resist neatness, rhyme, the too tightly worked, to make a landscape of thought, incidental, slow.

Outside the kitchen window, snow streams past a landscape in black and white, lines that shape the emptiness of our expectation. All landscape begins with the horizon. If I draw one line across the page I have sky and earth, and beginning with that horizontal, space opens itself around each dark stroke, a map of close and far, black isosceles triangles encode the winter spruce in deep snow.
Weigh anchor, sailors, we will set our course for what is beyond the dim line where the eye sees the world's end, to China or to the stars.

A pencil shades the textures of the bark on a bare winter tree. The fingers feel their way in a soft accumulation of vertical strokes: what the infant hand taught the eye, the eye teaches the hand. A grey trunk against the drifts, branches on pale sky, the darkened set of shapes of an empty room or the dim graphite shadings of your sleeping eyes, your hair across the pillow of our bed: this afternoon you set to exhuming old photos, your eyes young, daring, inviting the lover hidden behind the camera lens, your pose a provocation, libertine and calm.
A lifetime by now of the encounter of eyes, a sudden blue gaze, or the woman who stared in a bar in Milan--it might have been taken as rank hostility, curiosity, lust. We have met the glance of a thousand faces. The pencil moves, soft textures, closed eyes, behind them some other world.

Playing a disk of Shaker music recalls an old obsession, thirty years ago: their plain ways, the perfect lines of furniture, the pure life, the rejection of ownership, all that haunted me in the anxious days of an early marriage, being a father. I wrote it out in iambics and a four-line stanza, not without wisdom, I think, no, not altogether. Even now, older, quieted, I can be haunted by their precise acts, the gift to be simple, that will to innocence, wordless melodies, metres for dancing.
New Year's Day, the fields and trees still white, more snow falling on the symbolic anniversary of creation; the wheel of the world turns over.
We pause and rejoice. All things will be what they are unless we can jigger away history's mistakes.

Coming back through the woods on snowshoes, the tracks of rabbits everywhere beside the old logging road.
The animals, hidden by day, white lost in whiteness, feed at night and leave these trails past bare trunks or under an evergreen. Then a patch of snow trodden and retrodden as if a dancing floor.
I stop to wonder what bred such celebration-- a few wild cherries, flame on the monochrome background, shreds dropped on the packed snow where the varying hare rose on its hind legs to taste the sweet red fruit.

We wake each morning into the present tense: fresh snow, sunlight; a woodpecker climbs a narrow trunk, head hammering with the speed of a tremor; a red squirrel is travelling a branch, spilling snow. Yesterday I opened a drawer and found a watch, saved, forgotten, my father's initials inscribed on the back. I turned the stem at the top of the gold timepiece, rolling it between finger and thumb. Magic, it worked! The second hand ticked busily round its small circle, but the time it told, I learned soon enough, expanded, contracted, fast, slow, not unlike the examples given in Philosophy 1-- your hand on a hot stove or on your lover's breast-- oh sexist Philosophy 1! The spring within the watch had lost its temper, the integrity of compression and release. Time grew moody, changeable as a winter sky--a sudden lurch into afternoon, three black silhouettes of grouse in a treetop and then the spirits of night.

I lie awake, brood on the complications of family-- memory and apprehension, my father's face, children, grandchildren, everything that can go wrong.
January of another year: some say this now is the millenium at last, the beginning of Year One-- which has only logic on its side. Millenia are not mensuration but digital magic, the zeroes, click, click, click, click.
Decade, millenium--they are like the arithmetical and arbitrary sabbath, while the lunar month and solar year metre the universe.

Journal entry:

after the weekend siege of the snowstorm, a clear night--the full moon rose at dinner and set in an orange haze at the western horizon as I made coffee for breakfast. We slept under all that silence of blue light, saw chickadees at the bird feeder in this morning's snow. James Thomson in his long poem of the seasons describes a redbreast driven indoors by a winter storm and found by the hearth.
The bird picks and starts and wonders where he is,
and erases three hundred years in a shake of feathers.
The chickadee, head cocked, a sudden flaring flight, vanishes into the deep woods.

A photograph of a snowy landscape under a clear blue sky. A utility pole stands on the left, with a shadow cast long and dark across the snow. The snow is covered in subtle patterns and textures, suggesting wind-blown drifts. A small, cylindrical object is visible on the ridge of the snow in the background.

The winter landscape is etched on the watching eye.
After the storm has stopped and the wind has fallen, the snow lies in long elegant drifts where currents of air (like breath sharpened to a whistle, curling through the passages of a wooden flute, carried to the ear as music) swept round obstacles, house, shed, tree, and swirled into astonishing curves like the long arcs of the body--wind carrying flake after flake into peaks, and tunnelling hollows, double bends of some fluent unsolved geometry, edges crisp as pleats in cotton, a landscape that glitters in tomorrow's sun, white on white, all but translucent, until after a day or another day the sharp tops of the drifts are softened by sun, sublimation, the weight of snow, or revised by an hour's wind and flurries.

A photograph of a winter landscape. The foreground is a vast, flat expanse of snow. In the middle ground, there are several snow-laden evergreen trees and some bare, smaller trees. In the background, a dense forest of evergreens stretches across the horizon. A utility pole is visible on the left side of the image. The sky is overcast and grey.

Driving home at night, a plough on the road in front of me, the clouds of powdery snow flying. I am blinded, slow the car, cling to the wheel. On the radio, a talk cites global warming: in any system, he says, a rise in temperature is a portent of chaos.
I snap it off, glad when the plough turns aside. At home you have gone to bed. Deep snow on the porch roof is melting over the door, icing the jam, and I crack it with a hammer. All around disorder impends.
Tomorrow I must heave the thick drifts off that roof, but first a warm bed. Morning: small flakes dropping out of a clear sky, in the cold blue the last thin quarter moon, two crows flying away.
Sunrise, the loveliness of its colours on the glittering drifts, the intricacy of brightness in the lace of twigs.
As I clear the snow, a friendly neighbour warns me not to climb the roof. She admires the beauty of sun on the snow and icicles. I think of heat loss at the eaves, a frozen door, the imminence of disaster, and I set back to work.
